

I have had satellite radio almost from the beginning. I had long had enough of the car ads screaming at me, the same songs being played at the same time each day, and having to continually switch from station to station to station in the obscure hope that I could find out what the traffic was like where I was going. If the NAB doesn't like satellite radio providing these services, tell them to put out a better product; not ask big brother to help them keep doling out the same old, worn out programming that they've been doing for too many years. You can't stop change, especially when it's a good thing. So move over there with the telegraph, NAB. The future's coming through. Hopefully the FCC will have enough sense to stay out of the way!
